This is a test document that I created based on a similar one I saw on another site. Actually it was their opening page which I thought was great. I do not like the Spring Valley site where I have to go to menu after menu trying to find the information I want. At the end, because I think the menus are not real clear about what is in each menu I wonder if I have covered all the menus and the information I want is simply not there or I just cannot find it. Therefore, I generally do not use the Spring Valley website.

This page, as an opening page, would very quickly get a user to the person or subject right away. One could probably make it so clicking on a phone number would automatically call that number or access a mail screen to write to an email address.

In addition, to this, this entry screen could have all kinds of other things on it that are of current interest and tell the user where to go to get more information. For those new to the township, it could tell them about the recycling and dog licenses and where to get a form to fill out or to get more information. It could tell them where voting and town meetings occur. It could point out parks and recreation places.

Maybe one could even have business directories that contain information on local businesses.

These are just some ideas I have. We also should have page counters on it so we can see how many clicks we have on every page—how often each is accessed. No use improving it if no one uses it.

What do you think?
